Required Textbooks:

- 1) S. Pomeroy et al., A Brief History of Ancient Greece. Politics, Society and Culture, Oxford 2009 (2nd edition). “Greek” in the detailed outline below.)
- 2) M. Boatwright et al. A Brief History of the Romans, Oxford 2006. “Roman” in the detailed outline below.
- 3) University of Calgary, Greek and Romans Studies 205, The Western World, Penguin Custom Editions 2007. “Reader” in the detailed outline below.

NB: You do not have to bring your textbooks to class, but you must bring the reader to your tutorials.

Objectives:

This course consists of two weekly lectures by me and one tutorial by your TA. Lectures will focus on the chronological development of ancient Greece and Rome, and will introduce you to a large amount of evidence that helps to reconstruct the past.

Please note that the textbook material is not repeated in lectures (lecture topics and readings will be distributed on the first day of class). It would be advisable to have done the assigned readings before class, so you can raise questions and participate in discussion. Powerpoint presentations will be posted to Blackboard, but these are not a substitute for lecture notes.

Your TA will teach you to read and understand the primary documentary sources: that is, the ancient authors on whom we depend for our detailed knowledge of antiquity. Your TA will also teach you to write a paper and how to find material for it. As is true of the lectures, attending the tutorials is not optional; they form an integral part of this course.

The in-class test and the final examination are designed to let you show your general knowledge. Multiple-choice questions will examine the material we have gone through in the lectures, the primary documentary sources that have been dealt with in the tutorials, and the assigned readings. For the final exam there will also be a map question. Practice tests will be posted on Blackboard so you can become familiar with the system.

For each of the two essays, you will be given a choice among three topics. Consult with your TA about an outline, primary sources, and secondary literature.

Tutorials:*Each student must register in one of the six tutorials
