Course Description

This course is part of a two-course graduate sequence in international trade. Research in the field of international economics emphasizes both theoretical work and empirical analysis. Graduate courses in economics have traditionally focused on the theoretical modeling of international trade and have ignored the empirical literature in the field. The traditional approach has been to have one course focusing on general equilibrium theoretical modeling and a second course focusing on commercial policy. The trade expertise in the Economics Department at the University of Calgary allows us to offer cutting-edge courses in both empirical and theoretical international economics. Economics 619 focuses on the empirical analysis that has become paramount in the international trade literature. The companion course, Economics 621 focuses on the theoretical modeling that remains a key component in understanding the international economy and provides the foundation for empirical research. These two courses are complementary and can be taken in any order. Economics 619 examines important longstanding as well as contemporary issues in the empirical literature of international trade.

The course will be conducted as a seminar and will require class participation and involvement including class presentations.

Course Objectives/Learning Outcomes

The course objectives are to develop empirical skills and research skills in order to produce research papers with a focus on empirical international trade. By the end of the course students will be well versed in how to start a research project and develop it into a final product. Students will also learn about data sources and analytical techniques related to empirical international economics.
