

Things to remember when writing your quizzes:

- (1) Make sure you have a U of C IT account.
- (2) Many questions will be taken from the assignments. Note however that most questions in your assignments contain randomly generated numbers. Thus, in your assignments, you and your classmates all have the same questions but with different numbers in them. You should expect this to occur also in the quizzes.
- (3) For my sections, a basic scientific calculator is allowed – no graphing or programming facilities. You may bring your own, or you can use the Windows Calculator on your computer.
- (4) You should bring your own scrap paper.
- (5) You will be allowed a total of four submissions for the entire quiz. You cannot submit answers question by question. When you make one submission for marking, it counts as one attempt for the entire quiz, even if you have only answered one question.
- (6) Your quiz page has a time-display to show you roughly how much time is left for you. The computer starts timing you from the moment you click into the quiz page. The computer will give you signals when you are about to run out of time. If you have not yet submitted when you receive a warning that time is almost up, you should use your first attempt immediately even if you have not finished the entire quiz.
- (7) You should never use the BACK button on your browser. Its use will create inaccurate readings on the time-display, since the time-display is for your easy reference and is not what the computer uses to time you. Use the links and buttons available within WebWork to go from page to page.
- (8) You can write your quiz for 50 minutes or until 55 minutes from the official start time of your lab, whichever comes first. Thus if you are late by no more than 5 minutes, you will have 50 minutes, but if you are late by more than 5 minutes you will have less than 50 minutes to write your quiz.
